Abstract

The institution of family life, construed and maintained by social life itself, by the need to impose certain roles, norms and traditions has attained a number of specific functions that satisfy the most basic of human needs (safety, socialization, social recognition and appreciation). Sociological, anthropological psychological and other applied sciences try not only to classify and structure the many functions of family life but also to identify what is normal and what is deviant in this sense. In the present paper we present the results of a study regarding the psychosocial aspects of family life in urban Romania.
